Jim Murray (Western Michigan University, Director of the Medieval Institute)

Bruges, a cradle of capitalism

Referent: Peter Stabel (Universiteit Antwerpen: Departement Geschiedenis)

After teaching for a long period at the University of Cincinnati (OH), James Murray was appointed as director of the Medieval Institute of Western Michigan University at Kalamazoo. His research focuses at the intersection of medieval urban and economic history especially in Flanders and within Flanders, Bruges. He sought to understand how urban economies organized finance and trade in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries and how changes in economic structures shape, and are shaped by, political and social change. His book Bruges, Cradle of Capitalism, 1280-1390 (2005) got very positive reviews. It is an in-depth study of one of Europe's most important commercial cities in the period it functioned as the commercial capital of northern Europe. Successively the several aspects of the city life are analysed: demography, urban geography, the structure of trade and the money market, the important roles of innkeepers and money-changers, and the effects of the urban economy on the status of women, poor relief and charity.
